ABSTRACT

Housing is one of the main elements of a number of factors factors which determine the degree of comfort and well-being.

A major fraction of the population has not yet been able to satisfy the essential requirements in housing conditions. It is towards this population group that our attention should be directed with the aim of increasing well-being and happiness.

The housing conditions of this major population group, analysed and compared, show that it is becoming more and more urgent to incorporate more stringent immaterial concepts in our production calculations.

A decisive desire should prevail to protect man against the inconveniences of our industrial society, which are progressing to absurd dimensions, and to ensure better living quality as well as protection against the decay of his natural environment.
